

Q1.

Case Study:

Your friend has just cleared the Civil Services Examination (CSE). He was being given free education in a charity institute run by a political party. The party follows a non-centric or extremist ideology. He has been indoctrinated from childhood with the party's ideology. Once he cleared the examination and joined the foundation course, he achieved some understanding about his personality. He finds himself an extremist and at odds with many fellow probationers, faculties and serving and former officers. He thinks his extremist world-view is not wrong and he feels centrist views are nothing more than diplomatic. He claims centrist ideologies are meaningless and a conspicuous compromise of truth. You are his colleague in the foundation course with an ideology compatible with ideal civil servant i.e. centric, neutral and objective standpoints. You both argue and debate endlessly and many of your fellow colleagues find your friend is unfit for civil services. But your friend is very transparent to you and he repeatedly asserts that he wants to serve the public. He has made his mind for public service and he is ready to sacrifice all his personal wishes for it.
